Some Democrats have argued that Chris Coons has done what he needs to get things done in the Senate. They say Democrats need an effective negotiator who can work across the aisle to get things done. Next you'll read some arguments they make and we'll ask you rate them in terms of how persuasive you find them.

This is a divided country, which means you sometimes have to work with Republicans to get things done. Senator Coons successfully worked across the aisle to pass bipartisan legislation in the Senate to curb the opioid crisis. Someone who can't compromise won't get anything done for Delaware.

Would you support or oppose the next Democratic President adding seats to the Supreme Court? Proponents say that this is necessary to restore balance by reducing the influence of small number of ultra-conservative justices and that without this measure many positive reforms will be impossible to enact. Opponents say that this creates a dangerous standard and only further politicizes the court and that the intended effects will be short term as the Republicans will just add Justices next time a Republican is President. Do you support or oppose the next Democratic Senate Majority Leader ending the filibuster? Proponents say that the filibuster results in government gridlock by allowing a small minority to strike down popular legislation to fight climate change and expand healthcare access. Opponents say that the filibuster ensures that the minority party can block legislation, such as Republican attempts to repeal the Affordable Care Act, and that by repealing the filibuster it may hurt Democrats in the long run by removing a valuable tool for the minority party.
